Health workers learn to spot abuse signs

Rosie Batty with Dr Michael Nolan.

MORE THAN 40 medical workers from five practices in and around Bayside have signed up for a training course in responding to family violence.

Bayside Medicare Local, Melbourne University and Rosie Batty teamed up to run the practice-based education program.

Cheltenham's Dr Michael Nolan said health professionals had a vital role in supporting women subjected to violence.

"Whether they know it or not, your local GP will see five women every week who are victims of family violence, which is why Bayside Medicare Local is working with local practices to help address the rising number of domestic incidents in our region," Dr Nolan said.

Ms Batty, the mother of murdered schoolboy Luke, is behind the campaign to get more health professionals to do the training.
